It should also come as no surprise to viewers of previous Agatha Raisin episodes, myself included, that Agatha Raisin and the Haunted House is based on a novel by M.C. Beaton, that the locals engage in quirky activities (in this case, a costumed reenactment of a historical battle called Titney’s Knob), that Agatha finds herself in mortal danger during the show’s final minutes, and that there’s eventually a second murder to solve. But wait, this episode is so long that a third murder ...
