Many of the maps in this book have been reproduced at much too small a scale. Many (such as the first level of The Sunless Citadel, p. 13) should have been given a full page, but weren't. And others (most notably Dead in Thay, p. 111) cover so too much territory that even a full page isn't enough space. When a 5-foot square is only a millimeter ...

So, I was rereading Sunless Citadel, it seems like they changed the ending at some point. Thought at least for first post I'll put in spoilers, we don't need them after because I out spoiler in title. The boss fight and the ending don't agree. The ending of Sunless Citadel felt anticlimactic and robbed the players of satisfaction. Past the Citadel, the next adventure with the dwarven city has a Roper and the party is level 3-4 when they meet it. With 20 AC and 6 grapple/restrain attacks. It's pretty brutal. The dungeon experience is very indicative of old campaigns, in that it's just ...

He recommended Sunless Citadel — at the time I was running 3.5e, so there was some slight conversion from 3e needed. Once we got to the citadel proper I ran the module fairly straight and used pretty much all the content, but the first third of the campaign had the party searching around the starting town for clues, so I did end up inventing ...
